

Several many years after Sam & Janie Gillard moved to town, Janie's mother who had lived with them since I know the family [died]. Her husband died young. Everybody knew her as Aunt Caroline. During the time W.H. was County School Superintendent they called the office and said Aunt Caroline had died. They wanted me to go see them. I went to the house & there were more white people than blacks. The family always was respected and liked by all who knew them. This must have been in the early fifties.

During the time they lived at the farm, Emma had married and came back home to have her baby. We had to go see the new baby. Then people did not go to the hospital. At that time, Nashville did not have a hospital.
